Green Family

In 1867 a number of orphan children were brought to Plainfield, Indiana by the late Daniel Hill, who at that time was officially connected with the Children's Home of Cincinnati. Among them was a brother and a sister named Matthew and Jennie Green, aged respectively 10 and 7 years. Mr. Hill secured a home for the sister in the family of Jesse White, a farmer and nurseryman a short distance south of Plainfield, while the brother was placed in the home of a farmer not far away.

They grew up much as other children of the community. When of age Matthew Green left the farm and learned telegraphy, then going south obtained a position at a small town in Arkansas. The work in the office was not agreeable to him as he loved an active outdoor life so after a short time spent as clerk on a steamboat running between Memphis and New Orleans he went west into New Mexico and Arizona and engaged in R. R. construction work for a time, then went into Nevada and California where he took up the life of a prospector with varied success. Working farther north until in 1884 - six years after leaving Indiana he took up land in the Wenatchee Valley in the state of Washington which he thought he had reason to believe would some time be a valuable fruit growing section.

During these years the sister - Jennie Green, had formed an acquaintance with John W. Macy a young farmer of Henry County, Ind. and was married to him in the fall of 1883. The brother and sister kept up a correspondence through the years that followed, she telling of the progress of the struggle of her and her husband to secure and pay for a farm of their own and of her children and of the many little things that were of interest to both, while he told of his work on his land in summer and of his trips into the mountains far from civilization in winter, to wash pay gravel and sometimes engaged in hunting and trapping. On these trips in winter it was not practicable to get out of the mountains until spring. A place was selected for a camp and provisions brought in in the fall and preparation made to spend the winter. When spring came the sister and her family looked anxiously for a letter from him in which he told them of his success in washing gold and of his hunting and trapping and the disposal of his furs, etc.

Gradually by hard labor and perseverance he cleared the sage brush from his land, constructed an irrigation ditch, built fences and among the very first if not the first in that part of the state began planting fruit trees which he obtained by making long tedious trips over the mountains. As this work progressed he wrote to his sister that he was going to devote his time in the future entirely to the ranch and quit the mountains.

Finally after not having heard from him for some time a letter came telling that he had expected to be married at a certain time but the lady's brother had died and had put off the wedding for a time but before the appointed time arrived she too was called away. As might be expected his letters were gloomy and sad for some time. His sister though so far away, wrote him of her sympathy and tried to cheer him. He kept on with work, the trees first planted were beginning to bear fruit and promised to be more than he had even hoped for, more trees were planted until a large share of forty acres was fenced and irrigated and trees growing on it. To accomplish this he sold in 1896 forty acres of his land which was unimproved. In two days after the transaction was completed he discovered that in making the deed he had made a mistake in the description of the land, thus making the instrument convey the forty acre tract upon which his orchard was growing. He at once called the parties attention to the matter and made another deed correcting the old one and when this was delivered the party failed to produce the former deed stating that it was mislaid, and when found would be destroyed as it had not yet been recorded and having confidence in his integrity he gave the matter no more thought and but for what transpired some years after would not have been recalled. Notwithstanding the trees first planted were bearing and the orchard gave great promise in the near future, yet he had an intense longing at times for the free life in the mountains. So that in 1898 he leased the place for a term of three years, joined a party of ten men and set out for the wilds of British Columbia. They traveled from a point in the Wenatchee Valley to Kamloops, British Columbia with a train of pack horses covering a distance of about 800 miles. At Kamloops they procured their outfit and pushed on 400 miles farther north then sent the horses back and began prospecting in a wild virgin country but without marked success. At the end of three years all of the original ten had dropped out and returned to civilization except three others and him. He again leased his place for another three years and returned to prospecting. His three companions soon became discouraged and turned back. He pushed on following up the Gance River, crossed over the divide to the head waters of the Frazier River. His adventures here are better told in a letter written by Mr. J. W. Moxley to the sister.

During the years of this trip he wrote to his sister only at long intervals owing to the distance from any Post Office and the extremely difficult task of communicating with the outside world; but in the fall of 1903 he wrote that no opportunity would be afforded until holidays to get a letter out, but that she might look to hear from him about that time. And that he was going to make a final effort the following winter and if still unsuccessful in his prospecting he would return to his home and arrange his affairs, come on to the Worlds Fair at St. Louis and pay her a long visit. Holidays passed and the sister waited anxiously but no word came until the following February when a letter came from Mr. Edward Hinman, a trusted friend, under whose care and management he had left his affairs in his absence. This letter brought the sad news that the authorities of British Columbia had informed him that Mr. Green was dead. That an Indian had found his body and buried it far back in the mountains. With a sad heart the sister began planning with her family what they had better do. After some correspondence with Mr. Hixman it was decided to rent the farm in Indiana and go to the state of Washington, look after the brother's estate and endeavor to recover his body and bring it back to his home for burial. In a short time the farm was rented and the family on the way arriving at Cashmere, Washington April 16, 1904.

Arrangements were at once begun to carry out their purpose but by corresponding with the B. C. authorities but little could be learned. After about three weeks of investigation that did not give promise of any results the astonishment and joy of the family and friends can better be imagined than told by the receipt of a telegram to one of his friends that he was then at Quesnel, B. C. on his way home. He had no knowledge of the report of his death or that his relatives were at his home. These facts were wired him and he arrived at the R. R. station at 2:00 A. M. May 12, 1904.

He was greatly astonished upon his arrival here to learn that another person had a deed recorded and claimed his home that he had labored so long to secure. It was only after much thought upon the matter that he was able to remember the transaction of eight years before, then he realized that the former deed was not destroyed as promised but had been kept all these years and when the report of his death came it was placed on record and a claim made to the land with the evident intention of defrauding his heirs.

This circumstance was a source of much worry and wrought heavily on his mind. Yet he began planning and working at the orchard such as clearing away the brush after the trees had been pruned, procuring tools for cultivating the trees and repairing the irrigation ditches and in the meantime employed an attorney and began suit to have the fraudulent claim revoked. But in a little more than two weeks after his arrival he became seriously sick while attending decoration services but rallied again and upon the advice of a physician arrangements were made for his removal to a hospital the following day. The physician visited him late in the evening and found him sleeping very peacefully and left without rousing him giving assurance that he would be able to make the trip to the hospital the following day but he had scarcely left until his sister who was at his bedside alone was alarmed at his irregular breathing and almost before it could be realized, without scarcely the movement of a muscle the spirit had taken its flight. The disconsolate sister left now without a relative on the face of the earth, except her three children, felt keenly the loss of a loving brother, but thankful that she had been permitted to meet him again after so many years of separation and talk over the memories of childhood and to be able to minister to his needs in his last hours. Nothing was left undone by his old neighbors and friends to comfort and cheer the sister and family who were so far from home among strangers. He was laid to rest in the cemetery a short distance from the town of Cashmere... beautiful Wenatchee river. The spot is marked by a modest and appropriate granite monument erected by the sister. The sister's husband was appointed his administrator and continued the suit begun by him before his death and after a year and a half of litigation succeeded in having the claim revoked and compelled the false claimant to pay damages to the estate.

The family returned to their home in Indiana and there took up again the duties of home and community and often look back to their sojourn in the far west with feelings mingled with joy and sorrow.

This is incomplete, as several pages have been lost.

One page spoke of the time he was wounded and said he had torn up his shirt and bound up his leg and crawled "a long while".

Another page told of the day the word was received of the end of the war and he wrote "Up all night singing and rejoicing."

One or two pages had small poems written on them; he was fond of poetry and kept snatches of it written in long hand all his life, pasted into account books ( one is in the Indiana State Library.)
