The locusts were up in the year 1849.

James Herron commenced teaching school Dec. 27th A.D. 188 (47).

Builded our house in the year 1848 in the fall.

James Addison & David Clark both died with dropsy on the brain. Addison's disease was brought on by teething. David's from a deranged state of the stomach & bowels. He was first noticed unwell May 3rd. Both the boys wrought in spasms. David died very hard. He was half an hour in dying. He was an agreeable and very helthful child. Of course sickness and death was not expected. What an unpleasant thing to see, such pleasant flowers cut down just when they begin to unfold them selves to the view.

Profile of Inspiration

Herron was statewide leader

By JOHN BOWERMAN

When the conflict of the Civil War had ended, tragedy and heartbreak lingered on. For the most part those who had given so much to the war returned to their native soil to try to live with the sickening memories and, in so many cases, with broken minds and bodies. Montgomery County, and especially Crawfordsville, gave more than their share of men and leaders in that almost unbelievable ordeal. Only two of the five generals from Crawfordsville came back here to live. Many others did, however, return to serve well in the civilian life for which they had fought in their years of service. For this group, our community is deeply indebted. Perhaps standing above all others would be Capt. William P. Herron, a man whose life would ever be a profile of inspiration.

Except for the service in that great civil conflict and for a short time recuperating from injuries in the war, our subject spent his entire life in Montgomery County. He was born June 17, 1843, on the Ripley Township farm to which his parents had come in 1826, when the area was largely a vast wilderness. Like so many others, he laid aside his books at Wabash College to join the forces of the North. He returned to become an enterprising citizen, well-known business man, an outstanding banker and a statewide leader in many capacities.

The home he built still stands on Wabash Avenue. As a resident there, he became one of the many who truly made this street an Avenue of History in the quarter of a century following the Civil War. This is a story which remains for another time; yet in passing it must be said that few cities the size of Crawfordsville had as many truly outstanding individuals living on one thoroughfare.

Few families have contributed as much to the welfare of this county as the Herron family. We have said the family came here with the very first settlers and because of fine documentation, we know much of the family history. It is a family that has given attention to local history, and rightfully so, because they have been so deeply involved in activities which have contributed to that which is worthwhile.

We have said that our subject was born on the family farm in Rebecca coming to their land in Ripley Township is a classic story of the Indiana frontier. In October 1825, James had obtained the title to 160 acres. In late February the following spring in wagons loaded with provisions, they returned to occupy their new land. This was "sugar sap" time and to their consternation found a band of Indians were camped for what to them for years had been maple sugar time. James, with rifle in hand, gave warning that they were to be gone by morning. The first night was one without sleep, but at daybreak the Indians had obeyed his order and had disappeared. These were natives who only a decade earlier had perhaps participated in the Battle of Tippecanoe and were gradually seeing their happy hunting grounds go to the new settlers.

It was on this frontier farm that the future captain was born. In all there were 11 children. Two died in infancy and one died at six years of age. In 1845, a house made of brick and walnut produced on the farm was completed. Then in 1852, they sold the farm and bought one just south of Crawfordsville, which was later to be the residence of Jodie Smith. Our subject was but nine years old when he was sent to put in the winter wheat crop on the new farm.

When the Civil War came on in 1861, William, a student at Wabash, yet to reach his 18th birthday, enrolled in Lincoln's "Hundred Day Volunteers." In 1862, he signed up for three years in the 72nd Indiana Volunteer Infantry but after the battle of Stone's River, Tenn., he was transferred to the cavalry service becoming one of the famous Wilder's brigade, whom the rebels called "Wilder's Hellions." Herron was wounded at Hoover Gap, Rock Springs and at Chickamauga — this last place quite severely. He was with Wilson on his march to the Gulf and with Sherman as he "marched to the sea." His division owned the honor of capturing Jefferson Davis. In an authoritative book entitled "Cicamauga," the vivid story is told of comrades chopping Herron from the ground to which he was frozen in his own blood. The soldier's family relates that this episode was never told by the returned hero. The injury plagued him all the remaining years of his life.

At the time of his discharge from service in 1865, his health was extremely poor. He enrolled again at Wabash, but stayed only a short time. He served as a bookkeeper for a period of time and was County Treasurer for two terms. He served as president of the Crawfordsville Wire & Nail Co., the gas company, the theater and a heating company and was director of several local enterprises as well as director of an Indianapolis bank. He was a member of the commission that placed the Indiana monuments on the Chicamauga battlefields. For many years he was trustee of the Indiana State Home for the Deaf. He also served on the executive committee for the erection of the Soldiers and Sailors Monument at Indianapolis.

We have said that our subject was born on the family farm in Ripley Township. This was near the intersection of Indiana 32 and the Waynetown-Alamo blacktop. The parents were James and Rebecca (Young) Herron. James was born in South Carolina but at an early age moved to Ohio. He came to Indiana in 1825 and returned in the springtime of 1826 to settle on land he had entered from the government. Rebecca was from Ohio, her parents having come from Pennsylvania. The grandfather of our subject had emigrated to America prior to the Revolutionary War. He fought with the Colonies and was held as a prisoner of the British for two years. After his release he settled in South Carolina.

In 1868, he went to work at the First National Bank and except for the terms in the county office, he remained for 60 years. In 1895, Herron was elected president of the local bank. The effects of the 1893 panic were wearing off. Banking generally had suffered, but under the guidance of the new president, his bank continued serenely on its way. He continued in the top office until 1927, when, at 84 years of age, he was replaced by Sol Tannenbaum, a clothing merchant. The panic of 1929 hit just two years after our subject had stepped down from the executive position. The bank survived the panic largely because of practices established by President Herron.

In 1875, Herron married Ada Patton of Lafayette. She was an outstanding musician. They made their first and only home at 406 W. Wabash Ave. This was across from Wabash College and when it was built it was outside the city limits. In 1890, the frame home was moved to Pike Street and the beautiful building now standing and presently owned by Dr. Tanselle was constructed. Our subject lived there until his death in 1927. Herron was a close friend of Lew Wallace and many pleasant evenings were spent sitting in the front yard viewing the beloved campus across the historic avenue.

Seven children were born to this union. Four of their sons attended Wabash College and all who lived to adulthood served their country and community well. Much of the history of this remarkable family is contained in a small booklet entitled "The Herron Family," written by Charles Herron, who was a Brigadier General in the United States Army. It is written with accuracy and with family pride.

It is from families such as this that our community has been challenged to reach for great plateaus and it is from men such as Capt. William Herron that we will always see a profile of inspiration.
